JOHN LONG,

-THV-WOLF OF THE PRAIRIES.

The three murderers, after they had left St. Louis, made the best of their way to Belleville, Illmoss, where they arrived on the following night. They rested for a few hours at a tavern kept by one of their associates, and rose soon as night sets in." two hours after midnight to pursue their journey. It would certainly have been to their interest to have gone quietly along, without the commission of any new depredation, but habit Carpets and Oil Cloths, overruled all judgment, and perceiving an opportunity they could not forbear from stealing three fine horses, which were feeding in a meadow on the outskirts of the town. They felt the more emboldened to this act, as no person had seen them enter Belleville, or knew they reposed there in the tavern of their old friend and as they had made calculations for taking shelter in a wood ten miles further on, when daybreak might exhibit the suspicious nature of their cavalcade. In due time they arrived at the wood, stowed their beasts under leafy stalls, and laid down to resume the slumbers which prudence had shortened in Belleville. At mid-day their knapsacks gave them a meal of bread and meat, and a flask of whiskey which latter article received very little aid from the water of the pure rivulet that ran near by. While they were thus engaged, they were alarmed by a rustling sound in the leaves, and Long, turning his head quickly over his shoulder, perceived a pair of eyes shining through a clump of bushes, which on a steady look, he perceived were set in the abony framework of a negro's head. As he and his companions had been talking pretty freely, as well about the Davenport business as other exploits it was necessary that this observer should be made safe immediately; so jumping on his feet, he hailed him to come forth. The negro however did not obey the signal. All he had heard, had not prepossessed him in favor of the party, and fearing the fate of the drover. he struck his feet into the ground rabbit fashion, and rushed for an escape. But Long's finger was quicker than the negro's legs, and before his flight was well begun, his pistol cracked, and the dusky runner fell to the ground. Birch and Fox started forward at the same moment, and grappling the negro by the collar, led bim back. He was not wounded, With the sagacity of the ostrich, who sticks his head in a bush to hide from the bunter, he dropped after he heard the pistol shot, in order to escape the ball, and then found himself too frightened to get up. He had cause-for after a few questions, the replies to which convinced Long that he had overheard all their conversa tion, he made a motion to Birch, who at once

"The chance of danger is smaller than you think," returned Fox. "However, as that question is now settled by your consent, we will say no more upon it. It's my opinion that everything looks well. We'll sell the horses except the mare, put the money into our pockets, and strike for New York. There we can put our nag in trotting matches and take down everything that comes along." "I don't depend much upon that expedient as a means of profit," said Long. "however, I am in favor of the course you propose, and now, baving nothing else to settle, I guese we had better travel straight for Owen County, as "In the meantime," said Birch, "let's move to another part of the forest, for it will disturb my digestion to be so near the darkey whom I just took under the ear." "I would prefer to remain here," said Long, "so that if anybody stumbles on him at present, they may also stumble upon us, and give us an opportunity to lay them and the darkey side by side." "As you please," said Birch, and taking another drink, he rose and went to add some precautions which it struck him had been as yet neglected.

At night the robbers gathered their stolen beasts together, and left the scene of their latest murder, taking a north-easterly direc tion. Proceeding onward as rapidly as was consistent with a due precaution, they at length, arrived at the dividing line of the two States and crossed the Wabash, near Terre Haute. Two days more travel brought them to the Den of Thieves in Owen County. This place consisted in a wretched cabin, plunged in the centre of a thick wood, and exbibiting no evidences of anything but misery and squalor. It was but fourteen feet square, with an open porch or stoop, and the whole was covered with rough clapboards, laid on loose and confined with small logs piaced at equal distances apart, on the root. In this horrid hovel lived old Mrs. Long, the wife of Owen and the mother of the Eandith of the West. There also lived her daughter who was married to the proprietor of the shapty, Mr. Shack Phipps, and at the time of the arrival of the party from St. Louis, there also resided. Hiram Long. Old Mother Long, as she was familiarly termed among the outlaws of the western country, was a woman of some sixty years of age, of megre frame and most equalid and repulsive appearance. Her straight grey locks despite the attempted restraints of a yellow muslin cap, were continually flapping about her face, which was as dirty as her dress. Her language was frightfully profane for a woman of her age, and her whole manner which exhibited that contempt for the opinion of the world, that results from a pride in infamy, and a knowledge that no approbation is left to aim for but the approbation which proceeds from sin. Her daughter, the wife of Shack Phipps, was a female of about twenty years of age, of rather delicate features, but pale and attenhim through the head. The body was then uated, and hardly a better specimen of humandragged to a close undergrowth of bushes near ity than ber mother. She was beemeared with by, and as well concealed by their united is- dirt, and in speech was equal in vulgarity to the author of her life. Shack Phippe, her huspermit. This being done, they returned and band, was quite in keeping with the appearance of the other members of his family, and presented to the observation as strong a specimen of that nigger." said Fox, as he took his lips of ruffianism, as they did of meaner vilenesse and of dirt. The only offset to this wretched "he would have brought a good nine hundred group was Hiram Long, whose appearance in the robbers council at Washington Greve, we have already noticed. This party welcomed the fugitive morderers with all the cheer that their cabin was possessed of, and while the old woman and her daughter busied themselves in setting out the food and drink, Shack Phipps and Hiram Long took charge of the four horses, and sheltered them under an old shed still further on in the wood. After full explanations were had, it was decided that Shack Phipps should undertake to sell two of the horses, and that Hiram Long should assume the disposal of another, while Belleview, Iowa, I reckon," said Birch with a Fox was to retain possession of the race mare and the third animal in order that in traveling
